

THEORYbee

January 1st, 2013

In this letter I will describe the events that have occurred during the past year. When THEORYbee was launched, I was extremely optimistic. I still am, but as you can see, the momentum I had worked hard to achieve never came to fruition. Nevertheless, I am still developing version 2.0, hoping that those additions will aid in the discovery of THEORYbee.

I have posted to intellectual websites and have contacted numerous magazines. So far, not much attention has been given. I have determined that I will need some supplemental ideas that will push THEORYbee into the forefront. I haven't yet figured out what that will be. However, I'll be on the lookout for something that sticks out, and I will continue improving THEORYbee.

The hardest part is continuing to go on, even when it looks like I have failed. THEORYbee is completely operational, but not being used. I have funded the entire operation by myself, and I completely believe the idea will work. However, my many attempts to gain support have not resulted in much.

The things I intend to accomplish in the future are: contact bloggers, promote more awareness, publish an article, and expand the number of industries Theorybee, Inc. is a part of.

Despite things not going according to plan, I am determined to see Theorybee, Inc. become a successful company. Whether that means I continue pushing for THEORYbee, or enter into another venture, Theorybee, Inc. will continue on.

In the words of Morgan Freeman, "The best way to guarantee a loss is to quit."

Thank you for reading.

Very Respectfully,

Shane A. Boulware
Chief Executive Officer
Theorybee, Inc.